Aortic stiffness, carotid intima-media thickness and brachial artery flow-mediated dilatation in a sample of the general population. Carotid intima-media thickness (IMT), aortic pulse wave velocity (PWV) and flow-mediated dilatation (FMD) of the brachial artery are associated with the risk of cardiovascular (CV) disease. This study was conducted to compare the associations of these parameters and coronary heart disease (CHD) risk factors in a sample of the general population. Aortic PWV, FMD and carotid IMT were measured in 2504 men and women aged 35-60 years in whom CHD risk factors and carotid IMT were measured. Aortic PWV and FMD were lower in women than in men. Coronary artery disease was associated with higher aortic PWV, and abdominal obesity with higher aortic PWV and higher carotid IMT. Blood pressure was inversely related to aortic PWV, and smoking to FMD. Plasma levels of triglycerides, high-density lipoprotein (HDL) cholesterol and C-reactive protein were related to FMD. The association of these risk factors with CHD was largely independent of the effects of aortic stiffness and carotid IMT. In this general population, higher aortic PWV, lower carotid IMT and lower FMD were independently related to increased CHD risk factors. However, the correlation of the parameters with CHD was largely independent of the effect of the other parameters.
